Age-Management Growth Hormone

Human Growth Hormone (HGH) replacement therapy is quickly coming to the forefront of anti-aging medicine. It has been shown that as we age our body's natural growth hormone production decreases. Many aging related disorders and diseases are seen as a result of this decrease. More important, clinical evidence and recent medical research clearly demonstrates that by replacing Human Growth Hormone in IGF-1 deficient patients, we can significantly delay, prevent or even reverse many of the effects of aging. No other substance known to medical science has been consistently proven to deter and reverse the process of aging. Because growth hormone is anabolic, it stimulates the body's regenerative building of muscle and tissue. Optimal levels of this pituitary hormone are associated with increased lean muscle mass, higher energy levels and a greater sense of well being.

For this reason growth hormone is a key component of anti-aging programs that address a life long decline of physical and emotional health including a waning sex drive and weakened sexual function.

What is HGH?

Human Growth Hormone is an endocrine hormone that is produced by the interior portion of the pituitary gland. It is made up of 191 amino acids. Production of GH decreases as we age. Virtually every system in the human body is in some way dependant upon HGH for proper functioning. Growth Hormone peaks during adolescence and decreases dramatically thereafter.

At age 40 GH production is only 40% of what it was as age 20.

How is HGH taken?

HGH is taken daily by a small injection under the skin. This is the only application method proven to show results.
